The afternoon brought with it Mr. Henry Browning, and also a discovery. After the introductions were accomplished, and we,comfortably arranged, were launched upon the social sea, to missed Bessie. Where was she? She had a poculiar charm of conversation, by which she could make herself; if she choose, equally agreeable to old and young, and was always to be relied on im chance calls. Had she gone out of the room? No. She sat close by, listening with perfect well bred attention to our discourse. Whenever Mr. Browning addressed himself teler, she responded just as any nice, pleasant young lady would do, but not at all like my cousin Bessie. The Lord hath sent to us again, By his Almighty hand; And from our side has taken away, One of our little band. One Thursday, in the afternoon, That sad and mournful day; Four little boys went to the woods,

To bring us to our end.

LED BY A TREE.

To gather nuts and play. It was their intent to fall a tree : It being very late; Poor little souls, they could not see; What was one of their fate.

The boy was chopping on the tree,

When it began to crack; A dry tree leaned against the same, And instantly slid back, It fell and struck him on the head

He instantly did fall;

The children seeing what was done, They loudly for help did call. But when they saw no help was near, Unto the house they fled; And all crying as they went, "Phileman, he is dead!"

The news unto his parents flew,
Their hearts with grief were filled;
And crying, "Oh Lord must it be so, That my poor shild is killed."

No hand his life could save, His anxious friends awceping round, Could not save him from the grave. For God did take him to himself, His unknown power to show; Calling to us louder than words,

To be prepared to go. He was a lovely little boy, Not far from ten years old; He was the choice of all his friends, But now is dead and cold.
